The guy I had invited to share a day of bass fishing with me on Oregon's Ten Mile Lake wasn't happy.

"The hell with it!" I heard him snort. "I can't get this damn worm rigged right. I don't care if I don't get fish. At least I'll be able to keep my line in the water instead of screwing around trying to get this worm rigged the way you have yours."

You can always rig Wacky Style like this if you choose to do so, but many experienced anglers say you're better off using a band on your Senko.

If you actually pierce your Senko with your hook this is what might happen to your worm after a fish has grabbed it.
